Garnet

A gemstone of extraordinary beauty and versatility, holds a rich history and a captivating array of colours. Named after the Latin word "granatus," meaning "seed-like". Garnets have been cherished for millennia for their deep hues and enduring allure.

Comprising a group of closely related minerals, garnets exhibit a rainbow of colours, including red, orange, brown, yellow, green, purple and their combinations. The most familiar colour, deep red, resembling the luscious tones of ripe pomegranate seeds, is often associated with passion and vitality.

Garnets are silicate minerals with varying chemical compositions, with each type having distinct characteristics.

Almandine is known for its deep red colour and is frequently used in jewellery.

Pyrope garnet, with their fiery red hues, are prized for their intense brilliance and clarity.

Rhodolite which is a mixture of almandine and pyrope garnets is probably the most common type of garnet and were particularly popular during the Victorian era, where they adorned jewellery pieces favoured by royalty and aristocracy.

Grossular garnet is comprised of two well-known varieties, namely hessonite and tsavorite. They have been used in jewellery for centuries, particularly in ancient civilizations such as Egypt and Rome. In India, hessonite enjoys a special position amongst "navratnas" and is very much popular as "gomed".

Tsavorite garnet is named after Tsavo National Park in Kenya, where it was first discovered in 1967 by British geologist Campbell Bridges. The gemstone's striking green colour is reminiscent of the lush vegetation found in the park.

Andradite garnets, exhibiting shades of green, yellow, and brown, are valued for their rarity and unique colour palette. The prized variety of andradite garnet is demantoid, which gained popularity during the late 19th and early 20th centuries, particularly during the Art Nouveau period. The name "demantoid" is derived from the Dutch word "demant," meaning diamond, owing to its diamond-like sparkle. Russia's Ural Mountains are the fabled source of this prized garnet.

Spessartine garnet is known for bright orange colour. The name is derived from 'Spessart', a region in Germany where these garnets were first discovered. The alternative name "spessartite" is also commonly used, referring to the same gemstone.

While garnets are found in locations worldwide, notable deposits include Africa, India, Sri Lanka, Brazil, and the United States. The renowned Bohemian garnets from the Czech Republic have long been celebrated for their rich red colour and exceptional quality. Garnets with hardness between 6.5 to 7.5 on the Mohs scale qualify as a durable gemstone and is suitable for a variety of jewellery. Their vibrant colours and excellent clarity make them a popular choice for both traditional and contemporary designs.

In addition to their aesthetic appeal, garnets hold symbolic significance as the birth stone for January, symbolizing friendship, trust, and loyalty. They are also traditionally given to commemorate second wedding anniversaries, representing enduring love and commitment.

From ancient civilizations to modern-day adornments, garnets continue to enchant with their timeless elegance and vivid hues, making them a cherished gemstone beloved by many.

UNSTABLE COLOUR OF YELLOW SAPPHIRES

GAGAN CHOUDHARY, FGA

Since past many years, one concern our laboratory has heard from clients is the issue of colour stability of yellow sapphires. Some sapphires, particularly those with stronger yellow component fade over a period after routine usage. It has been known for many years that yellow to orange yellow hues induced by colour centres (formed naturally or by artificial irradiation) in corundum are not always stable, thus resulting in a yellow colour that fades slowly upon exposure to daylight and/or heat. Most of these sapphires, however, are not subjected to high-temperature heating.

THE SEVEN TYPES OF COLOURATION

There are seven types of yellow sapphire colouration, as described by K. Nassau in 1987, which are listed below.

Type 1: Yellow colour derived from a yellow stable colour centre; colour may be lost by heating; restored by irradiation (natural or artificial); usually from Sri Lanka.

Type 2: Yellow developed by irradiation (natural or artificial) of colourless material; yellow fading colour centre; may have been found yellow but fades on exposure to light.

Type 3: Yellow colour derived from iron, not heated.

Type 4: Yellow type 3 colour, derived from iron, intensified by heating; may have been colourless when found.

Type 5: Colourless or pale material with surface diffused yellow added, using Ni or other element.

Type 6: Synthetic sapphire with Ni or other element present as yellow colourant.

Type 7: Synthetic colourless sapphire irradiated to produce yellow.

Figure 1: As received, yellow sapphire displaying a saturated yellow colour (left) fades on exposure to strong light (centre) displaying lighter yellow. Yellow colour is restored to deeper yellow on exposure to UV light (right). This suggests presence of both, unstable and stable colour centres.

Considering the above seven types of yellow sapphire colouration, the first two types (type 1 and type 2) are of major concern. In the first type, if the colour is lost on exposure to light, it may be restored by irradiation or exposure to UV radiation (Figure 1). Exposure of these sapphires to strong light source would cause these stones to fade faster, typically in few hours. The colour, however, could easily be regained by exposure to ultraviolet light, in an artificial lamp or direct sunlight. This effect of fading in white light and reactivation by UV radiation is known in the scientific literature as reversible photochromism or tenebrescence. In type 2 sapphires, the mined stones are natural in colour but on exposure to light, may fade. Some deeper yellow sapphires fade to pale yellow, while some fade to near colourless.

This depends on the components of unstable and stable colour centres present within the same stone. Sapphires having a combination of unstable and stable colour centres show noticeable reduction in yellow colour after fading, while those with only unstable colour centres fade to near colourless (Figure 2).

As mentioned above, fading of colour is mainly a concern for yellow sapphires originating from metamorphic deposits, such as Sri Lanka or Madagascar, while those originating from basaltic deposits, such as Australia, Thailand or Tanzania are coloured by Fe<sup>3+</sup>, and are usually stable.

THE PROBLEM

Although, fading of yellow sapphires is a natural phenomenon, it raises concern over the authenticity of the sapphire under question. The sapphire which has not undergone any treatment still fades! And, till date, there is no gemmological test, which can determine if the suspected sapphire has unstable or stable colour centre.

THE 'FADE' OR 'COLOUR STABILITY' TEST

This test is a destructive method to estimate if the yellow sapphire has stable or unstable colour centre. When done, the test will bleach body colour of the sapphire, completely or partially. This test simply uses a strong light source, e.g. 150W halogen lamp. The suspected stone is kept directly beneath the lamp in a metal plate at around 4 – 6 inches away. The colour will start to bleach in exposure of few minutes; more the exposure time more will be the loss of colour. The duration of exposure to light source is highly variable and depends on the individual performing the test, but this may vary from 30 minutes to 3 hours.

Figure 2: This rich yellow sapphire (up) fades to near colourless (down) on exposure to strong light source. This suggests presence of only unstable colour centre.
